

DEATH OF TWO CHILDREN FROM COLD. — On Thursday evening last, a violent storm swept over the hills in this neighbourhood (Glossop), and two children perished in the storm. On Thursday, William Bullin, a travelling tumbler, set out from Sheffield, and was accompanied by two of his children, named Robert and James, aged respectively six and eight years. On the way he called at the Ashton Inn, and obtained a pint of warm ale, of which he gave a portion to the children. They then continued on their journey, and after they had passed the Snake Inn, they were overtaken by Mr. James Pickford, of the Bull's Head Inn, Glossop, who carried one of the children some distance, but who, finding that he would most likely perish with them, left them after giving them some rum. He then made his way as quickly as possible to Glossop, where he gave information of the state of Bullin and his children. The governor of the workhouse, with a horse and cart and several persons, immediately proceeded in search of the endangered persons. The man Bullin was found about a mile from Glossop, and was then leaning against a wall on the road side. His legs were so frozen that he could not move them, and he was scarcely able to speak. He was wrapped in a blanket, and some brandy was administered to him. The party then went in search of the children, who were found about two miles off. They were lying behind the drum, which their father had been compelled to leave with them; and they were both dead. The youngest had in his hands some snow, which he appeared to have grasped in the last agonies of death. The deceased children's father, who was taken to the workhouse, was attended by Mr. Howard, surgeon, and he is now out of danger. — Manchester Guardian.
